

Guidelines for school staff and parents on helping children and young people deal with fears and anxiety about war, conflict and frightening world events.

Threats or realities about conflict and terrorism can be a frightening experience for all people. Adults need to help children and young people to feel safe at a time when the world seems to be a more dangerous place. The rapidly developing events in Sudan, the ongoing tragic situation in Ukraine and the associated mention of a world war are disturbing for us all. This comes after the other scenes of violence across the world in Afghanistan, Hong Kong and South Africa, all of which had the potential to generate fear and anxiety. In addition these events are being experienced in the context of the recent pandemic which has had a significant emotional effect on our local community. We have local families who originate from Sudan and we need to be mindful of the impact of the widely reported events there are likely to have.

Parents and school staff can help children to: understand current and past events factually, to see how events do or do not impact on their lives, and to how to handle their emotional reactions. The degree to which children are affected will vary depending on personal circumstances. Most vulnerable are children who:

- live in proximity to past traumatic events
- have suffered a personal loss or had first hand exposure to terrorism, violence or war
- are of a cultural heritage or religion who feel threatened by intolerance and racism.
- have parents or relatives in military service
- have parents involved in emergency response or public safety
- experience anxiety, depression or have other mental health needs

All children, however, are likely to be affected in some way by frightening world events. For many, the guidance of caring adults will make the difference between being overwhelmed and developing life-long emotional and psychological coping skills. School staff and parents can help to restore children's sense of security by modelling calm and in-control behaviour. It is crucial to provide opportunity for children to discuss their concerns and to help them separate real from imagined fears. It is also important to limit exposure to media coverage of violence for young and vulnerable children.

What parents and school staff can do

Remain calm and reassuring:

- Children will take their cues from you, especially young children. Acknowledge that the threats and uncertainty are unnerving but the likelihood is that you and your children or pupils will be okay. There is difference between the possibility of danger and the probability of it affecting them personally.

Acknowledge children's feelings:

- Try to recognize the feelings underlying children's actions and put them into words. Say something like, "I can see that you are feeling really scared about this..."
- Allow children to discuss their feelings and concerns and encourage any questions they may have regarding current or past events. Listen and empathize. An empathetic listener is very important. Let them know that others are feeling the same way and that their reactions are normal and expected.

Help children to feel personally safe:

- Make time for class discussion. Always be honest with children and be prepared to answer questions factually. Share your fears and concerns. Put these fears in perspective as to what is realistic. Reassure them that responsible adults will look after them.
- Let children who are worried about a parent or relative involved in military action know that the chance of returning from a conflict zone is very high. Advances in medicine and technology have greatly reduced potential losses from military actions.
- Try to maintain normal routines and schedules to provide a sense of stability and security.
- Stop children from stereotyping people from specific cultures or countries. Children can easily generalize negative statements. Proactively teaching tolerance and a multicultural curriculum in school can help prevent harassment of pupils and improve their sense of safety.

Help children maintain a sense of control by taking some action:

- Finding ways to address the intolerance that leads to conflict and aggression at school can be one way to help children regain a sense of control.
- Do something positive with your children or pupils to help others in need

Pay special attention to children who may feel isolated:

- Children who are new in school due to relocation may benefit from a special network of “friends” to help orient the pupil to new school routines and encourage participation in school activities.
- Children from minority ethnic communities may feel vulnerable and require additional positive regard.
- Children in care may need extra attention to their feelings of separation and fear of loss.

Coordinate between school and home:

- School staff should let parents know if their child is exhibiting stress in school. Provide parents with helpful suggestions or information on community resources. Maintain general academic and behavioural expectations, but be realistic about an individual child’s coping skills.
- School staff should share information about social studies/history lessons and other relevant discussions that take place in the classroom with parents. This will help parents understand what their children are learning and can foster thoughtful discussion at home.
- Create a sense of collective security between home and school. This will help children feel safe and provide a sense of protection.

Expect and respond to changes in behaviour:

- All pupils can display signs of stress. Some may grasp at any control that they have, including refusing to cooperate. Some immature, aggressive, oppositional behaviours are normal reactions to uncertainty, including when world events intrude.
- It is important to maintain consistent expectations for behaviour. Be sure children understand that the same rules apply.
- Some children may have difficulty at bedtime. Parents need to maintain a regular bedtime routine. Be flexible about nightlights, siblings sharing a room, sleeping with special toys, and sitting with your child as they fall asleep. Doing so typically does not cause life-long habits.
- Children may play “war,” pretend to blow things up, or include images of violence in artwork and writing. This can be upsetting to adults, but it is a normal way for children to express their awareness of events around them. Gently redirect children away from violent play or efforts to “replay” the terrorist events, but don’t be overly disapproving unless the play is genuinely aggressive. Talk with children about their art or written images and how they feel. Share your reactions. Help them to consider the consequences of war or terrorist acts—what happens if a building blows up or a bomb explodes? For children who seek pretend play as an outlet, encourage role playing of the doctors, firemen, policemen, etc. who have helped to save lives. If a child seems obsessed with violent thoughts and images or show extreme reactions (aggression, withdrawal, sleeping problems, etc.), talk to school staff about possible forms of support, including referrals to local services.

Keep adult issues from overwhelming children:

- Don't let your children focus too much of their time and energy on a crisis or on the emotional outpourings in its aftermath. If children are choosing to watch the news for hours each evening, find other activities for them. You may also need to watch the news less intensely and spend more time in alternative family activities. Try to ensure as far as possible that access to media information is age appropriate
- Take time for yourself and try to deal with your own reactions to world events as fully as possible. This, too, will help your children and pupils.

Resources

For further reading and resources, search 'Children's terrorism support' where you will find links to London Grid for Learning, Gov.UK and US 9/11 memorial.org , all providing useful ways of talking to children and young people.

For further advice and support do not hesitate to contact your link Educational Psychologist.

Croydon Educational Psychology Service

edpsychology@croydon.gov.uk

February 2022

Material adapted from published sources and with thanks to Tower Hamlets EPS.